>>New Non-Invasive Test For Detecting Breast Cancer

A new Pap test for the breast may identify breast disease up to eight years earlier than a lesion that might be found on a mammogram or self-exam. The Halo Breast Pap Test System from NeoMatrix is now available in clinical practice.

Using gentle suction like a breast pump does, the HALO Breast Pap Test uses adjustable breast cups to collect Nipple Aspirate Fluid (NAF) from the breast ducts. By analyzing the NAF, it is possible to identify abnormal cells and potential precursors of cancer. Researchers have concluded that NAF assessment may be a useful objective tool to improve the prediction of breast cancer risk.

“We are excited about this noninvasive test to collect ductal fluid and the potential impact it can have to provide early warning signs of breast disease, particularly among younger women who have no other known risk factors and where cancers are typically very aggressive,” says Dr. Rosalyn Baster-Jones, Ob-Gyn and medical Director of the Preventive Women’s health Care medical Group in San Diego.

>>Self-Test For Bacterial Vaginosis (BV)

Fem-V is the first product of its kind on the market to be offered over-the-counter. The test allows women to determine whether they have a yeast infection or a more serious bacterial infection called Bacterial Vaginosis (BV). Since both infections have very similar symptoms, 50 percent of women misdiagnose and mistreat their infections. Misdiagnosis can lead to mistreatment of a BV infection, which can lead to more serious gynecological conditions, including pelvic inflammatory disease (PID) and infertility.
